Radiation, radiography is the administration and study of parts of the body using X-rays. This means X-ray radiography is an interdisciplinary or allied health science discipline. Radiography specialists are trained to use X-ray machines to produce images of the human body. Radiographers work in a variety of settings, including hospitals, clinics, and research laboratories. They are responsible for ensuring that the quality of the images is high and that the patient is comfortable. They also ensure that the equipment is properly calibrated and that the images are properly stored and processed.

Radiographers are trained to use X-ray machines safely and effectively, and they are responsible for ensuring that the patient is comfortable and that the equipment is properly calibrated.

With a little effort, the patient can be positioned so that the X-ray is taken in the best possible position. The patient is then asked to hold their breath for a few seconds to ensure that the image is clear. The radiographer then takes the X-ray. The patient is then asked to move to a different position and the X-ray is taken again. This process is repeated until the radiographer has taken all the X-rays that are needed for the patient's condition. The patient is then asked to move to a different position and the X-ray is taken again. Question 10: What is the purpose of X-ray?

The purpose of X-ray is to provide a clear image of the internal structures of the body. This is done by passing a beam of X-rays through the body. The X-rays are absorbed by the internal structures, and this creates a shadow. The shadow is then captured on a film or a digital detector. The resulting image is called an X-ray. X-rays are used to diagnose a wide range of conditions, including fractures, tumors, and infections. They are also used to monitor the progress of a disease and to guide treatment.
