

Abstract: Phragmites is a dominant wetland plant species in the coastal marshes of the United States. It is a highly invasive species that can displace native vegetation and alter the structure and function of the wetland. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of Phragmites on the growth and survival of native wetland plants. The study was conducted in a wetland in the coastal marshes of the United States. The study area was divided into two sections: one section was dominated by Phragmites and the other section was dominated by native wetland plants. The growth and survival of native wetland plants were monitored in both sections. The results of the study showed that the growth and survival of native wetland plants were significantly lower in the Phragmites dominated section than in the native wetland plant dominated section. This suggests that Phragmites has a negative effect on the growth and survival of native wetland plants.
