Simulation

Simulation is a technique for modelling a system or process that is too complex to analyse using analytical methods. It involves creating a computer model of the system and running it to observe its behaviour over time.

Types of Simulation

- Discrete Event Simulation: The system changes at specific points in time (events). Example: queueing systems, manufacturing processes.
- Continuous Simulation: The system changes continuously over time. Example: chemical processes, mechanical systems.
- Monte Carlo Simulation: Uses random sampling to model uncertainty. Example: financial risk analysis, project management.

Steps in Simulation

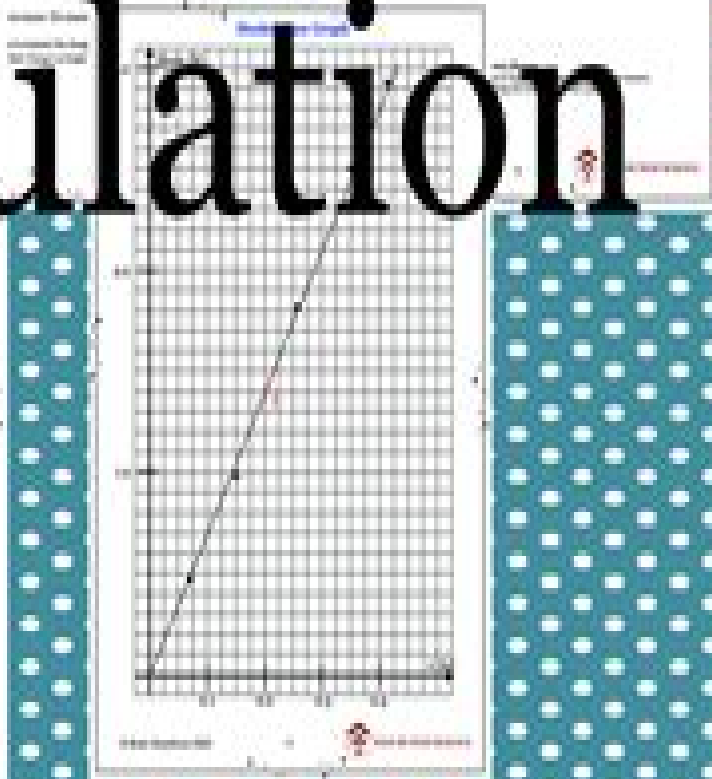

- Define the system and objectives.
- Identify the input variables and their distributions.
- Develop the simulation model (logic and data).
- Validate the model against real-world data.
- Run the simulation and collect results.
- Analyse the results and draw conclusions.

Advantages of Simulation

- Can model complex systems that are difficult to analyse analytically.
- Allows for the testing of different scenarios and the effect of changes.
- Can provide a visual representation of the system's behaviour.

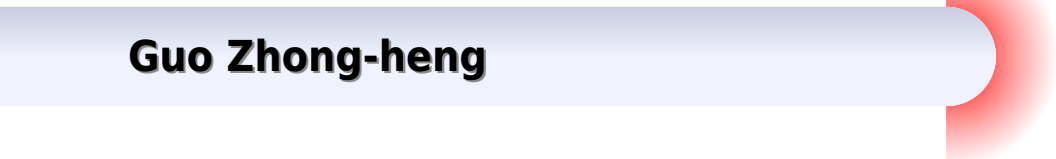

Limitations of Simulation

- Can be time-consuming and expensive to develop and run.
- Results are only as good as the input data and the model assumptions.
- May not capture all the nuances of the real system.
