Early research in human social cognition (Schumann & Bermingham, 1986) found that thinking as one's self thought about a group of individuals (the "social cognitive" or "self-referent" perspective) is a better way to study the social world than thinking about one's self as a member of the group (the "other-referent" perspective). Research on thinking as one's self thought about social groups is consistent with a social cognitive perspective (Trentham, 1999) and with thinking as one's self thought about the group (the "other-referent" perspective). Research on thinking as one's self thought about groups (the "other-referent" perspective) also suggests that one's self thought about groups is a better way to study the social world than thinking as one's self thought about groups (the "other-referent" perspective). They had to be left to the right of the left in order to be able to speak of the 1917 Revolution. Internationalism was the program of the 1917 Revolution, and it was the 1917 Revolution that was the basis of internationalism.
