1997) should not be taken as evidence for a causal role of environmental factors in ethnic differences in prevalence of "at-risk" nutritional outcomes of any kind and is difficult to interpret without additional studies. The commentators for 1997 provided us with some insight into that situation. It should be recognized that, in a cross-sectional study, the prevalence of malnutrition is a function of the number of children who are malnourished and the number of children who are not malnourished.
