

Animal Adaptations

Name _____

There are no alligators in the Arctic. Not all animals can survive in different habitats. They need to be adapted (well suited) to an area. Animal adaptations happen in three ways: the inside of the body; the outside; and an animal's behavior. The inside adaptations are called physiological (FIZ-ee-uh-LOJ-ih-cul) such as cobra's venom or skunk's spray.

A stick insect mimics a tree branch to better escape predators.

Outside adaptations are called structural. This can include a turtle's shell, quills on a porcupine, shark teeth, or a giraffe's long neck. These all help the animal in its habitat. Also included in structural adaptations are camouflage, when an animal seems to blend into the area; and mimicry, where an animal looks like something different like a leaf, or predator.

Animals also have behaviors that help them survive. Some behaviors are learned, like how to make a shelter, get food or behave in a group. Other behaviors are by instinct (born in them). By instinct animals migrate (move to a new area), are nocturnal (active at night), or hibernate (sleep through the cold). These adaptations help animals survive.
