

Observation Analysis Essay Example

Observing a classroom has a certain metaphysical edge. Merely by your presence and watching, you cannot help but feel that you are somehow changing or influencing the class and the students that make it up. My observations took place in two settings, the first and my primary observation source, was at Children's Garden Montessori School in El Cerrito, my daughter's school, it is a private pre-school with children ages two to five.

My second observation was the Fit Kids program at my local Berkeley YMCA, this program was created for children over the age of eight and combines educational video games, air hockey, tutoring, and physical activity, for children preadolescent to those well into their teen years. Maria Montessori believed that younger students, those up to the age of about 6, had a natural path for psychological development, and through exploration of their environment they would develop and learn naturally with minimal educator influence. For the adolescents, those on their way to becoming adults, the children are naturally creating a new psychological construction, that is based on their outside environment and those that make it up. This "free play" however is not free of manipulation.

Children's Garden Montessori, and others like it, encourage free exploration, but prepare and manipulate the environment. Lesson plans are established, and the tools and toys made available to fulfill the needs of those lessons. The environment has to be orderly and clean, the space also must be constructed to facilitate flow from activity to activity, and be to the proportion of the students in the school. The available materials, toys, and manipulatives, are limited so all aspe
