

The Agritourism as a Means of Sustainable Development for Rural Communities: A Research from the Field

Salvatore Ammirato, University of Calabria, Italy
Alberto Michele Felicetti, University of Calabria, Italy

Abstract: As from the second industrial revolution, rural communities have been affected by a continuous social and economic decline. The traditional economic development paradigms moved people and investments towards the industrialized metropolitan areas, causing depopulation of rural areas and loss of their cultural heritages. This development model became, with time, unsustainable from the social, cultural, and economic point of view. Modern patterns of rural development highlight that a rational and planned exploitation of agricultural resources together with the valorization of cultural and naturalistic heritage of rural areas are the right leverages to assure sustainable growth. In this work we analyze the potentials of Agritourism as a means of sustainable development for rural areas. To reach this aim, we present some findings of an explorative survey carried out in the Calabria region of Italy during 2012 on a sample of 52 farms offering agritourism activities. After analyzing the extent of the agritourism phenomena in the region, the survey aims to evaluate if agritourism can support sustainable development of a rural community becoming the hub of an "agritourism rural network."

Introduction

Recent years have been characterized by a growing interest in rural areas (Leon, 2005). Rural communities have been invested from deep changes consisting mainly in the shift of economic activities and population to urban areas and in the loss of significance of the agricultural sector as the most important sector in terms of production, wealth and number of employees as it was in the past centuries, although this is not uniform. These phenomena brought a crisis in traditional structure and organization of rural areas, exposing them to the risk of an economic, social, and environmental decline (Murdoch, 2000). Rural areas are facing a wide range of problems such as the growth of the unemployment rates, emigration, impoverishment of the soil, hydrogeological instability, loss of traditions, etc. The relevance of the "rural development" question is evident in the geographical extension of the EU rural areas (about 90% of the overall territory) and the deep changes which occurred in such areas in a relative short time (Hodge, 1986). The scientific literature often identifies such rural areas as "Lagging Rural Regions" (LRRs) (Volpentesta and Ammirato, 2007), referring to those areas with endemic problems that are broadly characterized by geographical remoteness, low population density, low income levels, limited employment opportunities, dependency on agriculture, poor service provision, and poor development capacities (Illbery et al., 2004).

If past development strategies were mainly focused on economic growth pathways, nowadays consequences of such indiscriminate growth (i.e: high social costs, indiscriminate use of natural resources, generalized pollution, etc.), have questioned the paradigm of "continuous economic growth" as the way to answer the rural communities' needs. The concept of rural development is becoming increasingly complex, going beyond the boundaries of the economic sphere and leading to a growing emphasis on the not overexploitation of natural resources and landscape, as well as on the stimulation and valorization of existing tangible (infrastructure, monuments, typical local foods, etc...) and intangible assets (culture heritage, traditions, history). Scholars group such patterns into the concept of "sustainable development," asserting the importance to involve local actors in common development pathways which lever on the
