

Of Mice and Men Book Report

The tale, which happens during the Great Depression, starts next to the Salinas River close to Soledad, California, where two transient laborers, Lennie Small and George Milton, are strolling en route to a close by farm. They have as of late got away from a ranch close to Weed where Lennie, an intellectually insufficient yet delicate man, was wrongly blamed for assault when he contacted a lady to feel her delicate dress.

As they stroll along, George chastens Lennie for playing with a dead mouse and cautions him not to talk when they show up at their new residence of work. When Lennie gripes about not having ketchup for the beans they have for supper, George loses control, revealing to Lennie that he would be in an ideal situation in the event that he didn't need to deal with him. After they make up, George rehashes to Lennie the subtleties of their fantasy - that he and Lennie will collect enough cash to purchase a fix of land, where they will have a little ranch with a vegetable fix and a hare pen. The bunny box is the main detail of the arrangement that Lennie reliably recalls. George reveals to Lennie that, on the off chance that he stumbles into difficulty as he did in Weed, he should come back to the brush close to the waterway and trust that George will discover him.

At the point when George and Lennie come to the bunkhouse at the ranch where they will work, an elderly person named Candy shows them their beds and discloses to them that the supervisor was furious that they didn't show up the prior night. Before long, the Boss inquiries
