

Geography fieldwork

- Anomalies – data values which don't match the pattern of a sample
- Local – tends to refer to a small area or region when considering the scale of study.
- National – referring to a nation or country; a scale of looking at things where particular countries are the subject of study
- Primary data – data collected by students personally during fieldwork
- Qualitative data – data involving the quality or nature of something rather than its quantity; can be used to refer to observations or opinions of people
- Quantitative data – data involving numerical values
- Regional – used to refer to the characteristics of a defined area within a larger area; the scale can vary but within geography regions could include East Anglia or a district within a country; a region is an area of land that has common features, which may be artificial, such as dialect, language, religion, industry or administrative boundaries, or natural, such as climate or landscape
- Scale – can refer to maps that are drawn at particular levels of detail; in geography, this often refers to whether something is looked at from the local, regional, national or global level
- Secondary data – data collected from sources other than the student; may include published material, reports from public bodies and the work of other people.
- Random sampling- is used where the area is the sea throughout. It does not matter where you take the samples. Random sampling is achieved by generating random numbers and using them as co-ordinates, such as co-ordinates to generate Ordnance Survey grid references.
- Systematic sampling- is used in places with an environmental gradient; where things change in a regular fashion, such as traffic along a road. You could sample at ten equally spaced points along a road to investigate changes in traffic density and flow. Every point should be evenly spaced or distributed.

Topic 1: Formulating enquiry questions

Sampling

Sample: a section that represents the whole of what is being measured

Why do we sample? Samples are inexpensive as they save energy and time, this is because you don't need to gather data on large areas, only a few sections are representative of a whole area of study.

Random sampling:

- May reduce representation
- May reduce bias
- Correlates to each section
- Each area has an equal chance of being sampled

Systematic sampling:

- Systematic sampling involves measuring the variables at regular intervals
- Sites are chosen to be representative
- However these sights may be unsafe or inaccessible

Stratified sampling:

- Stratified sampling involves using background knowledge to represent chosen sites
- This means that the sites are accessible and safe but background knowledge may be limited and results may be subject to bias
