Abstract: Phragmites australis (Cav.) Trin. ex Steud. is a dominant species in coastal wetlands and has been the subject of much research. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of salinity on the growth and nutrient uptake of Phragmites australis. The study was conducted in a greenhouse using a factorial design with three salinity levels (0, 5, and 10 dS/m) and three nutrient levels (low, medium, and high). The results showed that salinity had a significant effect on the growth and nutrient uptake of Phragmites australis. The growth of the plants was significantly reduced at 5 and 10 dS/m compared to 0 dS/m. The nutrient uptake of the plants was also significantly reduced at 5 and 10 dS/m compared to 0 dS/m. The results also showed that nutrient levels had a significant effect on the growth and nutrient uptake of Phragmites australis. The growth of the plants was significantly increased at high nutrient levels compared to low and medium nutrient levels. The nutrient uptake of the plants was also significantly increased at high nutrient levels compared to low and medium nutrient levels. The results of this study suggest that salinity and nutrient levels are important factors that affect the growth and nutrient uptake of Phragmites australis.
