

7.HEREDITY AND EVOLUTION

INTRODUCTION

A recognisable feature of a human being or any other organism) like height, complexion, shape of hair, colour of eyes, and shape of nose and chin, etc. are called 'characters' or 'traits'. The transmission of characters (or traits) from the parents to their offsprings is called heredity. In most simple terms, heredity means continuity of features from one generation to the next. The reproduction of organisms produces variations. The variations produced in organisms during successive generations get accumulated in the organisms. The significance of a variation shows up only if it continues to be inherited by the offspring for several generations. Evolution is a kind of gradual unfolding (or formation) of the new organisms from the pre-existing primitive organisms through slow and steady changes. We can now define evolution as follows : Evolution is the sequence of gradual changes which take place in the primitive organisms over millions of years in which new species are produced.

A. HEREDITY AND VARIATION

(a) Heredity :

It includes those traits or characters which are transmitted from generation to generation and are therefore fixed for a particular individual.

- Genetics : Study of heredity and variations is said to be known as genetics. The term genetics was first of all used by W. Bateson in 1905. An Austrian monk namely Gregor Johann Mendel was the first person to study genetics. He was therefore regarded as the 'Father of Genetics'.

(b) Variations :

Variation is concerned with the difference between the individuals of same species and also between the offsprings of the same parents.

Variations could be of two types :

(i) Somatic variation

(ii) Germinal variation

(i) Somatic variation : Somatic variation affects the somatic cells of an organism. It is neither inherited from parents nor transmitted to next generation. It is acquired by individual during its own life and is lost with its death. It is therefore also called as acquired variation. Somatic variations are due to :

(i) Environment : This includes the factors that affect the organisms such as food, air, pressure, humidity, water etc.

- Light : Strong sunlight affects the human skin by increasing the dark pigment melanin in the epidermal cells. Melanin protects the underlying cells by absorbing the ultra violet rays of the sun.

- Habitat : It also affects the genetic make – up of an individual and leads to variations.

- Nutrition : It is also one of the various factors that cause variations.

(ii) Use and disuse of organs : Continuous use of an organ makes it better developed whereas constant disuse makes it reduced.

(iii) Conscious efforts : Conscious efforts by man produce somatic variations in humans themselves, in domestic animals and plants.

(ii) Germinal variation : This variation affects the germ cells of an organism and is consequently inheritable. It is received by the individual from the parents and is transmitted to the next generation.

- Significance of Variation :

- Variation enables the organisms to adapt themselves to the changing environment.
- It forms raw material for evolution.
- It enables the organisms to face the struggle for existence in a better way.
- It helps men in improving the races of useful animals and plants.
- It is the basis of heredity.
- It also leads to the existence of new traits.
