Dribble Me This

1970) together in a short-term (week-long) experiment. The participants consisted of 100 men in the University of Minnesota (United States) and 100 women in the University of London (United Kingdom). A week was chosen for the experiment because it was long enough to allow the participants to become familiar with the situation and to develop a relationship with the experimenter. The participants were randomly assigned to one of two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group consisted of 50 men and 50 women, and the experimental group consisted of 50 men and 50 women. The participants in the control group were asked to perform a task that required a high level of physical effort, while the participants in the experimental group were asked to perform a task that required a low level of physical effort. The results of the experiment showed that the participants in the experimental group performed the task more efficiently than the participants in the control group. This suggests that a short-term experiment can be used to study the effects of physical effort on performance.
