

Hook (~25 words) - Optional:

Capture the reader's attention and give a preview of what's to come.

It was a Wednesday in November when a friend of a friend called to say, "I know you've had your background check done."

Context (75-100 words):

Provide some background info about you, like who were before this accomplishment, event, or realization occurred, and exactly where you were in life. Imagine this as the 'before' scenario.

I'd started volunteering with young children only months earlier. "I need someone to come with me," she said. "I'm leading a camping trip of forty girls tomorrow and one of the leaders just backed out. We don't have enough leaders. If I can't find someone, we're going to have to cancel the trip."

"I've never been camping," I told her, as my mind raced trying to figure out how I could get out of this. What she was describing wasn't even camping as I imagined it. This was backwoods camping: the girls would be carrying in their gear, tromping through the woods, there would be no facilities, and it was snowy, below zero temperatures in the mountains. Sensing my repulsion at the idea, she laid the pressure on thick and insisted the girls needed me. I could not refuse. Reluctantly I agreed to go.

Catalyst (125-150 words):

Introduce the accomplishment, event, or realization that occurred and give some details about what happened. Explain what it was about this experience that made it such a good opportunity for growth and learning.

The next morning I had a four hour rural drive to contemplate the weekend ahead. I would be sleeping on a cardboard pallet to keep the snow from getting my bedding wet. I wouldn't be fully changing clothes, only layers. I had to bring my own toilet paper. It was something I couldn't have imagined myself doing even twenty four hours earlier. I assumed I would cheerfully suffer through the weekend and never do anything like it again for the rest of my life. After all, I wasn't an outdoorsy person and I'd never had any desire to change that.
