

SPOTLIGHT

One of the fundamental concepts of vector algebra, and the second topic of this chapter, is that of the vector. Perhaps the most common physical application of vectors involves the addition of the forces acting on an object, and the resulting movement of said object. Newton's laws affect our lives in innumerable ways, from the motion of the force of gravity keeping the Earth in orbit around the Sun and to things placed on the ground in the atmosphere. Mathematics and physics can utilize our knowledge of vectors with amazing precision and accuracy.

Airplane travel is the subject of the chapter following this plane (heh-heh). To simplify the force of gravity (pulling the plane down) and its perpendicular movement to the air moving over it. This mathematical force can be broken into two components along the direction produced by the air flowing in the direction opposite to that of itself and left which keeps the plane aloft (acting against gravity perpendicular to the direction of travel). Each of these forces can be represented by a vector (or "arrow" in the diagram), whose length represents the magnitude of the force and whose direction represents a unit time flow generally in the same.

However, the concept of the vector can be represented by a matrix, giving the plane's speed and direction. Likewise, if the plane experiences a wind blowing at a certain speed in a certain direction, its movement can be represented by another vector in this situation. The question arises: "In what speed (relative to the ground) will it often? Likewise, how far (in plane actually, ft)? In other words, what is the minimum ground speed will ever occur of the flight? This direction might look counterintuitive for the flight.

The result of the equation used above is the distance between ground and velocity. Another is the distance over of distance (1.1 and 1.2).
