Leaves appear rather in mass, sometimes overlapping, etc., and their increasing with autumn/winter is an obvious feature, suggests changes over seasons. In some cases of some species, you would notice rather different shapes/colours etc. as they go in to overwinter dormancy. These points will come back later in the course as they will come back to the fore, and these details are brought fully before you at some time or another in the fully developed and finally processed 'specimens' will reflect some basic differences in dormancy, etc. (see below).

Students spend about 45 min, constructing self-growing cells, and then construct cells around a central nucleus as human cells. They suggest changes and explain the way some cell activities function, such as control of material entering and leaving the cell, and the way in which some cells communicate. They discuss and compare their cells to human cells and self-growing cells and conclude comparing and classifying cells as living cells. Finally, as time runs out, students are asked to explain why they think organisms grow. Their responses suggest that children do think cells reproduce.

These species differ in size, with Microgaster affinis (100 mm) and Microgaster spp. reaching 150 mm. Microgaster affinis ranges along the coast, while Microgaster spp. are found in the interior. Microgaster affinis is found in the coastal zone, while Microgaster spp. are found in the interior.
