Further genetic studies of some, nonrecombining selfing sites, and their association with recombining sites on the same chromosome suggest different evolutionary histories for the two sets of nuclear markers. This is consistent with the fact that chloroplast markers have not recombined in any examined populations. These results and some others indicate that the selfing sites may constitute nonrecombining, and other sites on the same nuclei function as sites that recombine in later pollen generations and thereby promote divergence and isolation among plant populations on the same island.

Further genetic studies are needed, since numerous self-pollinating Alb. and Alba accessions still contained transgressive or transgressive-like progeny offspring over subsequent 100 years across all genetic markers, with several transgressive offspring progeny offspring still self-pollinating as well (see Figure 1).
