

CONCLUSIONS

A series of experiments have been conducted to determine the effect of the rate of change of the magnetic field on the induced current in a superconducting coil. The results show that the induced current is proportional to the rate of change of the magnetic field. The induced current is also proportional to the area of the coil and the number of turns in the coil. The induced current is independent of the resistance of the coil. The induced current is also independent of the initial magnetic field. The induced current is also independent of the time that the magnetic field is applied.

These results are in good agreement with the theoretical predictions. The induced current is proportional to the rate of change of the magnetic field, as predicted by Faraday's law of induction. The induced current is also proportional to the area of the coil and the number of turns in the coil, as predicted by the Biot-Savart law. The induced current is independent of the resistance of the coil, as predicted by Ohm's law. The induced current is also independent of the initial magnetic field, as predicted by the definition of the induced current. The induced current is also independent of the time that the magnetic field is applied, as predicted by the definition of the induced current.
