

World Without Laws

5 pages | 1128 words

Envisioning a world without laws or a set of guidelines seems purely chaotic. Society would turn into an unconscionable primitive nature. Citizens would embark on actions that would build on their human consciousness. These actions would seem right to some and wrong to others. There would be no laws to govern crimes or wrongdoings and no consequences for that matter. Without any consequences for one's behavior there would be no rules. Society as a whole would need a set of guidelines that each member would abide by. The citizens would abide by these rules but would also be protected by the government. The purpose of the constitution is to maintain peace and order amongst the citizens of society. According Maisel (2003) The constitution created on September 17, 1787 is a document that serves as a structural piece of law that grants but also limits the powers of government it builds. Therefore, it creates a structural set of rules that society abides by and governs those rules but also protects the citizens under that government. The Magna Carta was a historic document created on June 15, 1215 that was an attempt by the citizens or barons of the land to prevent the king of misusing his power. Referenced in ("The Utah Bar Journal,"2015) This document was proposed as a resolution to a time that had political dilemmas between the King that was ruling over the barons. This was an answer to a society that had been feuding. This was an establishment for the first time that every individual including the King in power was to be subject to law. A charter of liberties that has the principles of limited government rights of the people. The roots and influences of the Magna Carta are present in many principals of the Constitution today. In spite of being created and written in two different time periods there are many similarities between these two documents. When one looks closely, you can see that some ideas from the Magna Carta itself are incorporated in the United States Constitution. One such similarity involves trial, both documents have language built in involving due process which led to trial by jury. In the Constitution this is affiliated with the judicial branch. The magna Carta states that everyone has the right to a fair trial. The Fifth Amendment of the US Constitution states, "no person shall...be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," as written in ("The Constitution of the United States" 2017). This notion was directly taken from the Magna Carta and incorporated hundreds of years later into the Constitution we use today. Another similarity between the two historic documents involved are similarities involving religion. The Magna Carta guarantees the freedom of the church. This clause would prevent the king from meddling in the church affairs. C. B., & J. H. (2014). In the US Constitution this is listed in the first amendment where freedom of religion is free from congress and there will be no law constraining or forbidding any exercise of religion. This is such a crucial statement that is used in our...
