The Publishers Weekly, 1903 Complete and Full with Numbers John MacQueen, 2006-01-01 This book presents a major re examination of the works of the fifteenth century Scottish poet Robert Henryson Encompassing the full range of the poet s work Professor John MacQueen opens up previously unexplored areas of both Henryson s literary practice and his underlying moral and philosophical vision MacQueen argues that numerology is central to the intellectual landscape that shaped Henryson s development as a poet and that numerological patterns and structures are embedded throughout his corpus revealing themselves not simply in such overtly allegorical works as The Testament of Cresseid but also in many of the Fables as well This book therefore recovers for a modern audience qualities to which Henryson s original readers would have been alert while at the same time conveying something of the energy and excitement of his intellectual and poetic culture Through a series of close and sensitive readings of the poems the book presents an original and lucid account of Henryson s work that will not only engage specialists in medieval Scottish literature but will also appeal to a wider readership with broader interests in narrative and poetic form

Children's Belief about the Social Consequences of Emotional Expression Jose A. Feito, 1997-08 This study investigated young children s expectations regarding others potential reactions to their emotional displays These expectations were considered precursors to the display rules for emotional expression evident in middle childhood Possible gender differences in the children s expectancies for the expression of anger sadness and fear were examined Preschool and early grade school children ages 4 3 6 4 7 0 8 7 respectively were presented with eight hypothetical narratives illustrated with felt puppets The identity of an audience figure accompanying the protagonist of each narrative varied between subjects in three experimental conditions mother father and same sex peer The narratives also varied the social context within which the protagonist expressed an emotion The scenarios were qualitatively coded to assess if children expected favorable or unfavorable reactions from the audience figure to the protagonist's emotional display. The expression of anger elicited substantial unfavorable expectancies from children in both age groups but the expression of sadness and fear did not. It was theorized that the display rules for these emotions have different developmental timelines. Anger receives early socialization pressure while sadness and fear are not sanctioned until after approximately age 8. Children expected peers and parents to respond equally unfavorably to expressions of anger suggesting that both groups are important agents in emotional socialization at this age. Unlike the preschoolers the early grade school children used social information about a provocateur's status and intentions to mediate their expectations regarding audience reactions to anger. The only significant gender difference to emerge was that the older girls expected mothers to be more disapproving of anger than fathers or peers. It was suggested that gender role requirements for emotional expression may not be enforced until children reach grade school ages and that the same sex parent may come to be the primary socialization agent for these roles. Asian American children held fewer unfavorable expectancies for the expression of anger than children of other ethnicities. African American girls held more unfavorable expectancies for the expression of anger than African American boys. Future research should elaborate upon the specific content and developmental timelines associated with different cultures' emotional display rules.
