Abstract. Despite recognition of students' diverse linguistic backgrounds and needs, opportunities are constrained. Research has shown that students' diverse linguistic and cultural experiences serve as a resource to enhance their academic achievement. However, research is mixed on ways to support these students. Some research suggests that it is possible only to allow parents' selection of an educational program to ensure safety for them as in the parallel language communities in their neighborhoods, but the more diverse students' social and cultural backgrounds become, the more difficult to use communities as models. Some argue that self-organized high-achieving parents within the language group can be successful.
