

secrete the adequate amount of lubrication during sexual intercourse. Hypoactive desire refers to the absence of sexual desire.

6. Sexual dysfunction due to a general medical condition: This is a disorder where there is evidence that a medical condition is the cause of disruption in sexual functions.
7. Sexual Pain Disorders: This is divided into Dyspareunia and Vaginismus. The former causes genital pain during after and at times before intercourse. The latter refers to the involuntary contraction of perineal muscles.

Sexual function is a process regulated, mediated and initiated by a series of physiological and biological interactions. Each partner's life experience, the shared and common experience of the couple and interaction patterns between the couple are attributes of the physiological aspect of sexual function. Malfunction of these physiological features could result in sexual dysfunction. The social settings which surround an individual can also trigger sexual disorders. Poor interpersonal relations between couples and members of the society can induce negative emotions, such as anxiety and depression which may result in sexual dysfunction. Hormones play a major role in mediating normal physiology in the body. Different sexes have different hormonal balance, for example, testosterone is in higher quantities in men whilst estrogen and progesterone are more in women. Genetic defects can cause alteration of these hormones, resulting in level of female hormones rising in men. This can lead to genetic identity disorder as the hormonal activities in an individual will generate emotions experienced by the opposite sex.
