

RESEARCH Journal of the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry 1999;38:1033-1040.

OBJECTIVE: To examine the effects of a 12-week, 10-session, manualized, group-based, parent training program on the parenting behavior of parents of children with conduct problems.

DESIGN: Randomized controlled trial.

SETTING: Child mental health services in a large inner city.

PARTICIPANTS: Parents of 100 children with conduct problems.

MEASUREMENTS AND MAIN RESULTS: Parents were randomized to either the parent training program or a waitlist control. The program was designed to improve parents' knowledge of child development, enhance their understanding of the child's behavior, and provide them with strategies to manage their child's behavior. The program was evaluated using a series of standardized measures of parenting behavior. The results showed that parents in the parent training program had significantly higher scores on all measures of parenting behavior than parents in the waitlist control group. The results also showed that the program had a significant effect on the child's behavior, with children in the parent training group having significantly lower scores on all measures of behavior than children in the waitlist control group.

CONCLUSIONS: The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, 10-session, manualized, group-based, parent training program can effectively improve the parenting behavior of parents of children with conduct problems. The program can be used as a first-line intervention for parents of children with conduct problems.

KEY WORDS: Parenting behavior, child development, child behavior, parent training, waitlist control.

INTRODUCTION

Parenting behavior is a complex phenomenon that is influenced by a variety of factors, including the parent's own experiences, the child's characteristics, and the social environment. The parent's role in the child's development is crucial, and it is important to understand the factors that influence parenting behavior in order to develop effective interventions for parents of children with conduct problems.

One of the most common interventions for parents of children with conduct problems is parent training. Parent training programs are designed to improve parents' knowledge of child development, enhance their understanding of the child's behavior, and provide them with strategies to manage their child's behavior. There is a growing body of research that suggests that parent training programs can effectively improve the parenting behavior of parents of children with conduct problems.

The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effects of a 12-week, 10-session, manualized, group-based, parent training program on the parenting behavior of parents of children with conduct problems. The program was designed to improve parents' knowledge of child development, enhance their understanding of the child's behavior, and provide them with strategies to manage their child's behavior. The results of this study will be discussed in the context of the current research on parenting behavior and child development.

1. The first step in the process of developing a new product is to identify a market need. This involves conducting market research to determine what customers want and need. Once a need is identified, the next step is to develop a concept that addresses this need. This concept should be unique and offer a clear benefit to the customer. 2. The second step is to develop a business plan. This plan should outline the company's goals, the market it will serve, and the resources it will need. It should also include a financial forecast and a marketing strategy. The business plan is a critical document that will guide the company's development and help it secure funding. 3. The third step is to develop a prototype. This is a physical model of the product that can be used to test the concept and gather feedback from potential customers. The prototype should be as close to the final product as possible, but it can be made from inexpensive materials to keep costs low. 4. The fourth step is to conduct a pilot test. This involves selling the product to a small group of customers and monitoring their reactions. This test will help the company determine if there is a market for the product and if the concept is viable. It will also provide valuable feedback that can be used to improve the product. 5. The fifth and final step is to launch the product. This involves marketing the product to a wider audience and making it available for purchase. The company should continue to monitor sales and customer feedback to ensure the product is successful and make any necessary adjustments.	1.
