ABSTRACT

Impact factor, which is a measure of the frequency of citation of articles published in a journal over a specified time, measures the rank or importance of a journal. There is a trend towards publication of high quality research in journals with high impact factor. This paper has outlined the importance, method of calculation, clinical implications, pitfalls and financial issues related to the impact factor of medical journals.

INTRODUCTION

There are approximately 30000 journals included in the PubMed journal list of the United States National Library of Medicine and over 28 million citations on biomedical literature are recorded in the PubMed. Every year, several new journals on all medical specialties are being added up on the list.<sup>1</sup> Journals are published either by well-established academic institutions and societies or private organisations. The common goal of all medical journals is to disseminate new scientific knowledge and evidences amongst the clinicians and researchers for betterment of the patient care and improve the outcomes of treatment they receive. However, there has been a significant rise in the number of privately-funded open-access medical journals with associated commercial intentions.

Published articles provide different levels of evidence, which may include systematic reviews and meta-analysis (Level 1a), prospective randomised controlled trials (1b), cohort studies (Level 2), and case reports and case series (Level 3). These articles are cited by researchers in their new publications relevant to their research to compare and contrast their works with previously published research. The importance, quality, reputation or the prestige of journals in their fields is measured objectively by calculation of Impact factor (IF).<sup>2</sup> After using journal statistical data in-house to compile the Science Citation Index for many years, Eugene Garfield from USA devised the concept of IF in 1955.<sup>3</sup> He was the founder of the Institute for Scientific Information (ISI®), which is now part of Thomson Reuter, which is a large world-wide US-based publisher. IF is calculated each year by the (ISI®), for those journals which are indexed with it and are published in the Journal Citation Reports (JCR®).<sup>4</sup> Since the year 2008, ResearchGate (RG), a Germany-based database and social network service, has records of several thousand publications registered by individual researchers and has been calculating IF for journals as well as individual researchers in the form of an "RG Score".<sup>5</sup> This paper aims to outline the importance, method of calculation, clinical implications, pitfalls, and financial issues related to the IF of medical journals.

CALCULATION OF IF

Impact Factor is a measure of the frequency with which average article in a journal has been cited in given period of time. The IF for a journal is calculated based on a three -year period and is considered to be the average number of times published papers are cited up to two years after publication.<sup>6</sup> For example, the 2017 IF for a journal is calculated as follows:

X = the number of times articles published in 2015-2016 were cited in indexed journals during 2017

Y = the number of articles, reviews, proceedings or notes published in 2015 -2016

2017 Impact factor = X/Y

It is to be noted that the 2017 IF is actually published in 2018, because it could not be calculated until all of the 2017 publications have been received.

CLINICAL IMPLICATIONS

Impact factors of some of the popular health-related journals is listed in Table 1.<sup>4</sup> The New England Journal of Medicine and The Lancet have maintained their highest IF over last few decades.<sup>7</sup> It is true that majority research works, which are likely to make significant
