These two components create the distributional structure of income, and together with the age and sex effects give insight into how heterogeneity in people's basic health conditions, like the ones genetic factors contribute to, may influence the distribution of income in society and health. An important reason for the current discussion.

Shapiro's theory implies that a person's beliefs concerning the degree of control in the environment determine their political participation. People's political participation should correspond to their beliefs concerning the degree of control they need to exert on their environment. Shapiro's theory can be tested by comparing people's political participation to their beliefs concerning the degree of control they need to exert on their environment.
