Cardiac Conduction

The heart has the most complex electrical control system and structure actually residing the heart is higher than. This electrical system is called the cardiac conduction system. It is made up of specialized tissues and cells producing the heart the cardiomyocytes directly to the atria and ventricles, including the bundle of His, the atrioventricular node, the left and right atria, ventricles, together that followed by the contraction of the ventricles together.

The cardiac conduction system is composed:

located in the central part:

1. The Sinoatrial Node

The sinoatrial node is the primary pacemaker of the heart, which generates the electrical impulses that will control the heart rate.

2. The Atrioventricular Node is located between the sinoatrial node and the ventricles, which slows down the electrical signal from the sinoatrial node.

3. The Purkinje Fibers

These fibers carry the electrical impulses to the ventricles, causing a contraction. The impulses travel up the left bundle branch, ventricles into the right bundle branch and left bundle branch, ventricles in Purkinje fibers, spread throughout the ventricles.

The Heartbeat

The sinoatrial node initiates the heartbeat by sending an impulse through both atria, causing them to contract first and then the ventricles (left side). This electrical impulse is the heartbeat, causing a contraction of the left atrial bundle branch, and into Purkinje fibers within the ventricles causing both ventricles to contract.

As the impulse travels through the heart, cardiac muscle cells contract, as the cells depolarize. Depolarization is caused by a flow of ions (sodium and potassium) across the cell membrane, which causes the cells to contract. Cardiac muscle cells are contractile. When the impulse first passes, the cardiac cells contract to the left to the cardiomyocytes. This electrical depolarization and contraction cause the heart to beat through the left ventricles, causing the cardiomyocytes to contract. The left side will contract first, followed by the right side. The electrical impulse travels through the bundle of His, the atrioventricular node, the left and right atria, ventricles, together that followed by the contraction of the ventricles together.
