ABSTRACT

INTRODUCTION: Interviews for selection into post graduate training courses are an accepted method of selection, there is the presumption that such interview processes are fair to both candidates and the training scheme.

AIM: Due to concerns over unconscious bias and a desire to move to best practice, the Royal New Zealand College of General Practitioners introduced the Mini Multiple Interview (MMI) process as the selection process for doctors wishing to enter vocational training in general practice.

METHODS: Aspects assessed during the interviews were developed through wide consultation and included: reason for wanting to undertake training, managing poor compliance, addressing issues of equity, managing complaints, insight and understanding the role of general practitioners in chronic care. There were 218 applicants who took the MMI. Demographic data as well as scores were collected.

RESULTS: The MMI process has good reliability and performs well in several aspects of validity. All three interview venues had similar results. There was no gender difference in overall result or scores. New Zealand graduates scored higher than overseas graduates. Of the 218 candidates, 12 were considered not yet ready to enter training.

DISCUSSION: The MMI process appears to have acceptable reliability and good validity. The structure of the MMI is likely to have reduced unconscious bias. Further research will study the predictive validity of the MMI for this cohort of candidates.

KEYWORDS: General practice; vocational training; interview.

Introduction

Admission processes for postgraduate training aim to select candidates who are likely to successfully complete the training and become competent practitioners in their discipline. A second objective is to design and implement a process that reflects the needs of a high-stakes assessment. Historically, interviews have been used as part of the process of candidate selection, with the typical structure being an in-depth single interview with two or three people. Concerns over issues of interrater reliability (would the interview score be the same regardless of who was interviewing and marking a candidate?), validity (does the test measure what it is supposed to measure?) and poor ability to predict future academic performance led to the development of alternative methods of candidate selection, such as the Multiple Mini Interview (MMI) for both medical school and vocational training programmes.¹

The MMI is conceptually similar to an Objective Structured Clinical Examination (OSCE) with multiple stations, each assessing a different attribute
