

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then randomly selects a name from the names placed in bowls for each group. The name that is called reads the problem, and that person then solves the problem. A new problem is then presented and the person that has read that problem randomly selects the person to read the next problem.

After the 10th problem, each student randomly selects the person to read the 11th problem, and the process continues. For example, student A might select student B to read the 11th problem, and student B might select student C to read the 12th problem, and so on.

The teacher takes a count of the number of times each student reads and has been selected to read for the duration of the lesson, creating a tallying sheet, which shows each student's total number of problems read and the number of times each student has been selected to read a problem. At the end of the lesson, the teacher randomly selects a student to read the 13th problem, and then repeats the activity.

After the 13th problem, the teacher randomly selects a student to read the 14th problem, and then repeats the activity. The teacher continues this process until all 13 students have read a problem.

The teacher then asks the students to discuss the results of the activity. The teacher asks the students to discuss the results of the activity and to discuss the results of the activity.

The teacher then asks the students to discuss the results of the activity.

The teacher then asks the students to discuss the results of the activity.

ANSWER EXPLANATION: The first student to read the problem is the student who is selected to read the problem. The first student to read the problem is the student who is selected to read the problem.
