■ Abstract: While numerous studies have shown that the abundance of a life-dependent forage may affect the survival of a predator, this is not always the case. In a laboratory experiment, we tested the hypothesis that the abundance of a life-dependent forage affects the survival of a predator. We used a life-dependent forage (a specific type of prey) and a predator (a specific type of predator) to test the hypothesis. The results showed that the abundance of the forage did not affect the survival of the predator. This suggests that the abundance of a life-dependent forage may not always affect the survival of a predator.
