F.J. Kruger,D.T. Mitchell,J.U.M. Jarvis,2012-12-06 The theory of ecological convergence underlies the biogeographers maps of world biome types It also determines the degree to which ecological principles derived from research on particular populations communities or ecosystems are generally valid and hence also to what extent resource management principles are general To quote Di Castri and Mooney 1973 In effect in order to assess the transfer of technology it is essential to know to what extent information acquired from studying one particular ecosystem is applicable to another ecosystem of the same type but situated in a different location The five relatively small isolated mediterranean climate zones of the earth each with its distinct fauna and flora have provided the ideal testing grounds for this theory A heritage of precisely focused ecosystems research has resulted beginning with the international comparative analyses conducted by Specht 1969a b but with antecedents in earlier studies in South Australia Specht and Rayson 1957 Specht 1973 Cody and Mooney 1978 reviewed the information available at the time for the four zones excepting Australia and concluded that the arrays of strategy types to be found among the different biotas were so similar that they could be explained only in terms of the convergence hypothesis nevertheless evident differences in community organization and dynamics especially phenology required closer study of resource availability and resource use patterns to better explain relations between form and function overall and to assess the degree of convergence at higher levels of organization than the population World City Syndrome David A.
