

Psych – Chapter 10: Intelligence

- Intelligence is not something that has concrete existence, but instead a socially constructed concept
- Intelligence is the ability to acquire knowledge, to think and reason effectively, and to deal adaptively with the environment

INTELLIGENCE IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

- Sir Francis Galton and Alfred Binet are 2 of the major contributors to the study of mental skills

Sir Francis Galton: Quantifying Mental Ability

- Found that smart people often came from the same family
- BUT he dismissed that fact that the successful people he studied usually came from privileged environments (belief bias)
- Measured nervous system efficiency with a variety of tests (reaction speed, hand strength, sensory acuity, skull size, etc.) to try to demonstrate a biological basis for eminence by showing that successful (smarter) people would perform better on these tasks
- He was NOT successful in this

Alfred Binet's Mental Tasks

- Was commissioned to develop a modern intelligence test
- Made 2 assumptions about intelligence:
 - 1) Mental abilities develop with age
 - 2) The rate at which people gain mental competence is a characteristic of the person and is fairly constant over time
- The result of the testing was a score called a mental age
- this is the age that they perform at (ex. A 6 year old who could go math problems that a 10 year old can has a mental age of 10)
- Stern came along later and developed a relative score – to compare people's intelligence with different chronological ages
- This score was called IQ (intelligence quotient)
- It represented $(\text{mental age} / \text{chronological age}) \times 100$
- So for example a child who is performing exactly at his age level should have a score of 100
- Today's tests no longer use this mental age concept
- Mental age concept worked well for children but not for adults
- Also, some intellectual skills show a decline at advanced ages
