Although COVID 19 no longer dominates the news numerous unanswered questions persist In the midst of the pandemic there were many publications that with hindsight were subject to several confounders For instance there were multiple reports suggesting that COVID was responsible for the development of both Type 1 and Type 2 diabetes However a significant portion of these reports were affected by ascertainment bias during that period It is accepted that a substantial number of undiagnosed diabetes cases exist within the population The heightened focus and testing of individuals revealed numerous new cases but these could have merely been pre existing undetected conditions and potentially unrelated to COVID Moreover throughout the lockdowns many individuals were reluctant to visit doctors offices or clinics resulting in a fall in detection rates of various conditions including many endocrine conditions with subsequent increases in case detections There is considerable previous evidence indicating that the stress induced by a critical illness can precipitate endocrine disturbances such as diabetes and thyroid disorders and such consequences would be anticipated following severe COVID 19 Therefore with the passage of time a more measured assessment of many such questions is now possible There are also many questions relating to endocrine complications of long COVID
