Handcrafted Hope

The female sex has long been suggested to have a greater capacity for learning than males. This paper reports on a study that examined the effect of sex on learning in a laboratory setting. The results showed that females performed better than males on a learning task. The results also showed that the effect of sex on learning was moderated by the type of task. The results suggest that females have a greater capacity for learning than males, but that this capacity is not always expressed in the laboratory setting.
