Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the performance of a simulated 1000-m swimmer's start. The subjects were 10 male swimmers who were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group received a 12-week training program that focused on improving their start performance. The results of the study showed that the experimental group significantly improved their start performance compared to the control group. The improvement was measured by the time taken to complete the 1000-m swimmer's start. The experimental group's start time decreased by an average of 1.5 seconds over the 12-week period, while the control group's start time remained relatively constant. The study concluded that a 12-week training program can effectively improve a swimmer's start performance.
