

Gel Electrophoresis Introduction

Introduction:

Gel Electrophoresis is a lab procedure scientists use to separate pieces of DNA by length.

How it works:

1. A scientist uses a micropipette (a hand-held tool that acts like a precise mini-syringe) to place samples of DNA inside wells in a gel square made of agarose, a thick substance that looks similar to really thick, translucent Jello. The gel also contains a chemical called ethidium bromide. Ethidium bromide sticks to the DNA and causes the DNA to glow under UV light.
2. The gel is placed in a liquid solution called "buffer" inside a gel electrophoresis chamber. The buffer helps electricity flow through the gel.
3. An electric current is applied to the solution inside the gel electrophoresis chamber by hooking the box up to a power supply.
4. DNA is negatively charged, so it is attracted to the positive electrode of the gel electrophoresis box and starts to move through the gel towards the positive electrode.
5. Small DNA fragments move faster through the thick "mesh" or "matrix" of the agarose gel. Larger DNA fragments travel slower.
6. After some time, the gel is removed from the box. The DNA fragments (stained with ethidium bromide) form bands on the gel that can be viewed by shining a UV light through the gel.

In the diagram below, 10, 100, 500, 1000 identifies the length of the DNA fragments in each tube in base pairs.

Wells

1	3	5	7
10	100	500	1000 and 100

Gel Electrophoresis Chamber for Approximately 30 Minutes

Note that lane 1 (containing the smallest length DNA fragment) traveled the furthest on the gel towards the positive electrode. And a fragment in lane 7 traveled the least.

See in Lane 7 that two different size DNA fragments in the sample are separated on the gel. You know the fragment that traveled farther is the same length (100 bp) as the fragment in lane 3, because it traveled the same distance.

Also, notice that no DNA solution was added to wells 2, 4, 6, or 8 and there is nothing in those lanes.
