Introduction

Creating the Constitution

What compromises emerged from the Constitutional Convention?

Introduction

When the American quest for independence ended, Americans began to argue heatedly about the future of the United States. One Virginian Patrick Henry called James Madison "the father of the Constitution." While working in Congress during the war, Madison had tried and failed to get the states to work with him to create a stronger central government. He now knew that the states would not agree to a stronger central government until they had a plan that would give them more power than they had now.

After declaring independence in 1776, Congress did not create the national government. Instead, each state made its own laws. Madison and other members of Congress began to realize that the states were not working together and that a stronger central government was needed to protect the rights of the states and to provide for the common good.

These solutions were called "government by the states" or "government by the people." The states created "state governments" in which "each state makes its own laws, and each state is responsible for its own people." The "League of Friendship" was a treaty in which the 13 states agreed to work together to protect their rights and to provide for the common good.
