ABSTRACT Background: The use of the Internet for health information is increasing. Objective: To determine the prevalence of Internet use for health information among a sample of the adult population in the United States. Design: Cross-sectional survey. Setting: National Health and Medical Care Survey, a national probability-based household survey. Subjects: A sample of 10,000 adults in the United States. Measures and Main Results: The prevalence of Internet use for health information was 10.5% (95% confidence interval [CI], 9.2%–11.8%). The prevalence of Internet use for health information was higher among those with higher education, higher income, and higher health insurance coverage. Conclusions: The use of the Internet for health information is increasing. Keywords: Internet, health information, prevalence.

Abstract: In the spring of 1994, a group of health care providers met to discuss the need for a patient safety program. The group was composed of a physician, a nurse, a pharmacist, and a social worker. The group was charged with the task of developing a patient safety program. The group met for several months and developed a patient safety program. The program was implemented in the spring of 1995. The program was successful in reducing the number of patient safety incidents. The program was also successful in increasing the awareness of patient safety among health care providers.
