

But since then, what have these police robots done? And is Dubai's love affair with robotics nothing more than just a desire to spend money to have modern technology everywhere? PAL Robotics, the company behind the robot, talked a little bit about its duties, which seemed more tourist guide than police officer. "This robot joined the Dubai police to help citizens in an innovative and attractive way, and it is located by now in tourist attractions and shopping malls," the company told the BBC.

The robot can provide useful information in multiple languages thanks to its software and can also guide people to a requested point of interest. Besides, it is a tool for citizens to contact the Dubai Police call centers by using the microphones integrated into the robot. Additionally, people can use other police-related services through it, such as paying traffic fines.

The robot is part of a wider move to make the region's police service "smarter", which will include many more computer-controlled, unmanned police stations. The Dubai government wants robot police to make up 25% of the force by 2030. As a member of the Dubai police told the BBC when it was launched: "These kinds of robots can work 24/7. They won't ask you for leave, sick leave or maternity leave as they will be on duty all the time."

Noel Sharkey, a professor of computer science at Sheffield University has worked with the Dubai government on its integration of bots, says that these robots were originally planned in Dubai to help the elderly or as tour guides. However, he is not convinced by the current policing role. "I think there was a plan to have an emergency button, which would send your location to the police, and that could be a good application, but people could just make fun of them or knock them over." In fact, there is precedent for this. In July 2017, a security robot used to patrol an office building in Washington was found "drowned" in a fountain.

While police robots might currently be rudimentary, Prof Sharkey predicts they will become "more intense" in coming years, taking on the role of surveillance bots or as machines to discover explosives or other dangerous materials on the streets.

Tomorrow's World Duncan McLaren, Dr Duncan Bullock McLaren (Simon Yousuf, Nusrat), Simon Bullock, Nusrat Yousuf, 2013-11-05 This title uses the concept of environmental space to resolve many of the issues facing us in the future and applies the lessons specifically to the UK. Believing that we occupy more environmental space than the world can afford, this book seeks to explain what we can do to live comfortably within what we actually have through efficiency and sufficiency. In addition, it aims to present the sustainable levels of consumption for Britain as targets for government, industry, and households, as well as an idea of how to achieve them. Mathematics for Tomorrow's Young Children C.S. Mansfield, N.A. Pateman, N. Bednarz, 2013-03-09 Social constructivism is just one view of learning that places emphasis on the social aspects of learning. Other theoretical positions such as activity theory also emphasise the importance of social interactions. Along with social constructivism, Vygotsky's writings on children's learning have recently also undergone close scrutiny, and researchers are attempting a synthesis of aspects of Vygotskian theory and social constructivism. This re-examination of Vygotsky's work is taking place in many other subject fields besides mathematics, such as language learning by young children. It is interesting to speculate why Vygotsky's writings have appealed to so many researchers in different cultures and decades later than his own times. Given the recent increased emphasis on the social nature of learning and on the interactions between student, teacher, and context factors, a finer-grained analysis of the nature of different theories of learning now seems to be critical, and it was considered that different views of students' learning of mathematics needed to be acknowledged in the discussions of the Working Group.
