

Asexual Reproduction in Plants

Type of Reproduction	Brief Explanation	Example	Justification for your example/image
Bulbs	A central bud surrounded by thick, fleshy leaves swollen with stored food. In spring, the bud uses the stored food to develop into flowers and green leaves above the ground. These green foliage leaves now make food which they send underground to their bases, causing them to swell (next year's fleshy, food storing leaves). The old food storing leaves shrivel and dry up to form a protective cover on next year's bulb. A new terminal bud grows and the new bulb is ready. Lateral buds may also sprout during the season and, by laying down their own food store, become daughter bulbs.	Onions	 The diagram illustrates the life cycle of an onion bulb. It shows four stages: 1. A mature bulb with a central bud and a protective dry leaf cover. 2. A cross-section showing the internal structure. 3. A young bulb with a new terminal bud. 4. A daughter bulb growing from the side of the parent bulb.
Runners	Runners are long, thin stems which grow along the ground from the parent plant. Roots and buds appear at the ends of these runners and new plants develop from these.	Strawberries	Strawberries spread by the means of runners. Since each parent plant produces a number of runners, a very dense patch of plants can form, crowding out the competition.  The illustration shows a strawberry plant with a runner growing along the ground. The runner is a long, thin stem that grows from the base of the parent plant. At the end of the runner, a new plantlet is developing, showing how the strawberry plant spreads.
