Leadership often is characterized by exactly the opposite of change, by the unwillingness to be influenced by others. For this reason, leadership is often the most difficult thing to do.

It's important to note: while it's often assumed that the more people know about a company, the better, this isn't always true. For example, if a company is too open about its financials, it might reveal too much about its strategy or competitive position. So, while transparency is important, it's also important to know when to hold back.
