

The Old Man Who Said "Why"

Once there was a fairy who lived on a farthest star. He was very good natured and had yellow hair and blue eyes. Everybody in the air all everywhere and in all the stars respected him, and took all their troubles to him whenever something went wrong. For millions of years he lived quietly and happily without growing any older (because he was a fee and fairies never grow any older) and he was very polite and he had a wonderful smile and a pair of golden wings.

All the people on the stars and everywhere and in the air had wings (although they weren't fairies themselves) because to travel in the air everywhere and from one star to another star you have to fly. In the people were flying most of the time. They would open their wings and fly down to breakfast, and then fold up their wings and eat lunch. When it was lunch time, they would fly from the air, or wherever were playing into their houses, and fold up their wings and have a glass lunchbox made of star-petals and air-flowers. Then they'd sit and have a little nap, and when they woke up they'd fly to a window to play again away up in the air. And after supper they'd bed and fall fast asleep, to dream all night about rainbows.

It wasn't very often that these people had troubles to take to the farthest star, but whenever they had them, they'd fly over to the farthest star and lived, taking their troubles with them under their arms, and he'd examine all the troubles (no matter how big or how little the whether they were just plain troubles or troubles in fancy boxes with pink and green ribbon) and he'd give advice to all the people. He brought him these troubles and would never charge them even. He liked to be nice to people, you see.

Well, after this fairy had lived happily and quietly for millions
