

PRODUCTIVITY OPERATIONS

The United States is in the forefront of productivity gains. It is important to increase a country's output with a given amount of resources. Some ways of doing this are: by streamlining the the 10 states, the government reports, with 100,000 jobs added last year for wages ranging from $4.50 to $5.50 an hour. The states are not required to maintain the minimum wage at a certain level, but most have raised theirs in the past year.

There is a danger to Soviet workers, who continuously change to improve things, because the government is unable to keep up with them. It is necessary to change the economic mechanism in order to bring the economic mechanism into line with the needs of the people. The government must learn to manage the economy better. The government must learn to manage the economy better. The government must learn to manage the economy better.

These government actions were widely criticized by the business and labor. The business and labor groups had established the National Labor Relations Board in 1935, and they were alarmed by the new National Labor Relations Act. The act gave the National Labor Relations Board the power to investigate and settle labor disputes. It also gave the board the power to order companies to hire back workers who had been fired for union activities. The act was a major victory for the labor movement.
