How Do I Train My Dog To Stop Barking When I Am Tired And Resting At Home? Nitin KANANI,2019-10-20 How to Deal with Excessive Dog Barking Dogs don t rely on vocal communication in the same way humans do but it still forms a major part of the way they express themselves and their emotions to other dogs and to their human family There s more to a dog s vocal repertoire than a simple woof our canine companions make use of whines yips yelps whimpers grumbles howls and growls in their communication Some are even fond of a big hearty sigh There are lots of reasons why dogs bark but remember barking may only seem excessive to us barking in any form is all part of a dog s nature Seemingly excessive barking might be due to a separation related issue or they might be trying to tell you there s

someone at the door or if you're in the middle of a game they might bark to show that they're having a good time. If you've got more than one dog it doesn't always take much for one to set another off. Some dogs however can become over excited and might continue to bark long after the postman has left for example or you've finished playing fetch even once you've told them to be quiet. This can be troublesome especially if you have neighbours close by. The go to response for many owners of barking dogs is to shout a bit louder telling them to be quiet but this can make your dog feel threatened or they might think that you're simply barking along with them. There are lots of products on the market designed specifically for excessive dog barking that aim to calm and quieten your dog such as anti bark collars that administer a slight electric shock or a nasty spray. We don't recommend these as they're unnecessarily aggressive and unpleasant and suppress your dog's natural behaviour and need to communicate. Plus smell spray collars continue to punish your dog long after they stop barking as the smell will linger in their very sensitive nose. These punishing types of collars won't deal with the underlying cause of the barking and your dog will take their frustrations out in other ways such as chewing the furniture or even themselves. Instead try to find out why your dog is barking. Is it to warn you about something? Are they barking out of frustration or boredom or in order to get your attention? Are they barking because they've been left alone and they're trying to call you back? Once you've identified the cause you can get to work on training techniques that will help tackle the problem in the long term. Make sure your dog gets plenty of exercise after all a tired dog is usually a quiet dog. It can also be helpful to limit their access to windows fences and glass doors so that they can't get het up over anything they see outside even if it's just a car driving past. Orange paw and hand icon. Otherwise training dogs not to bark especially in the house usually involves the speak and shush technique which perhaps confusingly is best done by first training them to bark on command. Here's how. Enlist the help of a training partner and ask them to stand outside the front door while you and your dog are inside the house. Ask your dog to speak at which point your friend should ring the doorbell or knock on the door. This should prompt your dog to bark and when they do give them a treat and lots of praise. Practice this little and often in various locations and soon your dog should bark when you say speak whether there's someone at the door or not. Now you've taught your furry friend to speak it's time to teach them to shush.
