

■ Steady improvement In the 10 years since the last survey, the number of people who say they are in good health has increased by 10 percentage points, from 53% to 63%.

During the second survey, the respondents indicated that the most important factors in the decision to pursue an international project are to have the necessary close, highly dependent family involvement as argued, the low investment costs (Argentina has relatively cheap labour and land), and the fact that the respondents were mostly 1970s and 1980s students who have lived and/or studied abroad in various countries during the last 20 years. According to 1980s, although the data of projects are collected by 1990s, the respondents are mostly students who have or graduated in the 1970s and 1980s. I cannot distinguish whether the respondents are mostly graduates of 1970s or 1980s.

During interviews, I asked the respondents to tell the priority, namely, about the reasons of their decisions. In the questionnaire, I asked the respondents to tell the most important and important reason (one reason only) of their decision to start the international project. In the questionnaire, I asked the respondents to tell the most important reason of their decision to start the international project. I asked the respondents to tell the most important reason of their decision to start the international project.
