TYPES OF GALAXIES REFERENCE SHEET

Galaxies are vast systems made up of stars, gas, dust, and dark matter, all bound together by gravity. They come in many shapes and sizes, and astronomers generally classify them into three main types: spiral, elliptical, and irregular. Each type has its own unique characteristics, including their shape, size, and the way they form and evolve.

SPIRAL GALAXIES

Spiral galaxies are the most common type of galaxy in the universe. They have a central bulge and two or more spiral arms that extend outwards. The spiral arms are made up of stars, gas, and dust. They are often found in clusters or groups, and they can interact with each other, leading to the formation of new stars.

ELLIPTICAL GALAXIES

Elliptical galaxies are the second most common type of galaxy. They have a smooth, elliptical shape and a central bulge. They are often found in clusters or groups, and they can interact with each other, leading to the formation of new stars.

IRREGULAR GALAXIES

Irregular galaxies are the least common type of galaxy. They have an irregular shape and a central bulge. They are often found in clusters or groups, and they can interact with each other, leading to the formation of new stars.
