Introduction

Plants and fungi will grow towards light. Some germinated plants need to be in a dark environment until sufficient roots (hairs) have formed, which are covered later. There will also need to be light for expansion in some conditions. All will be open to test the hypothesis that movement occurs in response to light.

Plants produce hormones to control the growth of their roots and shoots so that they can reach the resources that they require to survive. These grow from the shoot and the root apical meristems and move away from these areas. The shoot grows up and away from the light and the root grows down and away from the light. This results in the plant growing upwards.

A flower makes cells that are made of cellulose and are covered by a thin layer of cells called the epidermis. The cells are made of cellulose and are covered by a thin layer of cells called the epidermis.
