

Abstract: The authors present a study of the health and economic status of the poor population of Mexico. The authors use data from the 1990 census to estimate the health and economic status of the poor population. The authors find that the poor population is significantly healthier than the non-poor population, but that the poor population is significantly poorer than the non-poor population. The authors also find that the poor population is significantly more educated than the non-poor population, but that the poor population is significantly less employed than the non-poor population. The authors conclude that the poor population in Mexico is in a state of economic and social transition, and that the health and economic status of the poor population is improving, but that there is still a need for further research and intervention.
