Models that Predict Standing Crop of Stream Fish from Habitat Variables Kurt D. Fausch, 1988 We reviewed mathematical models that predict standing crop of stream fish number or biomass per unit area or length of stream from measurable habitat variables and classified them by the types of independent habitat variables found significant by mathematical structure and by model quality Habitat variables were of three types and were measured on different scales in relation to stream channels variables of drainage basins were measured on the coarsest scale from topographic maps channel morphometry and flow variables were measured in the field along transects perpendicular to flow and habitat structure biological physical and chemical variables were measured on the finest scale in the field We grouped the 99 reviewed models by the types of independent variables found significant during model development A primarily drainage basin 5 models B primarily channel morphometry and flow 16 models C primarily habitat structure biological physical and chemical 25 models D a combination of several types of variables 39 models and E tests of weighted usable area as a habitat model 14 models Most models were linear or multiple linear regressions or correlations but a few were curvilinear functions exponential or power Some used multivariate techniques principal components or factor analysis and some combined independent variables into one or more indices We judged model quality based on simple criteria of precision and generality coefficient of determination sample size and degrees of freedom Most models were based on data sets of fewer than 20 observations and thus also had fewer than 20 degrees of freedom Most models with coefficients of determination of greater than 0.75 had fewer than 20 degrees of freedom which led us to conclude that relatively precise models often lacked generality We found that sound statistical procedures were often overlooked or were minimized during development of many models Frequent problems were too small a sample size possible bias caused by error in measuring habitat variables using poor methods for choosing the best model not testing models using models based on observational data to predict standing crop and making unrealistic assumptions about capture probabilities when estimating standing crop The major biological assumption that the fish population was limited by habitat rather than fishing mortality interspecific competition or predation usually was not addressed We found five main ways stream fish habitat models are used in fishery management To be useful for analyzing land management alternatives models must include variables affected by management and be specific for a homogeneous area of land

Deep Learning for Marine Science Haiyong Zheng, Mark C. Benfield, Hongsheng Bi, Xuemin Cheng, 2024-05-15. Deep learning (DL) mainly composed of deep and complex neural networks such as recurrent network and convolutional network is an emerging research branch in the field of artificial intelligence and machine learning. DL revolution has a far-reaching impact on all scientific disciplines and every corner of our lives. With continuing technological advances, marine science is entering into the big data era with the exponential growth of information. DL is an effective means of harnessing the power of big data. Combined with unprecedented data from cameras, acoustic recorders, satellite remote sensing, and large model outputs, DL enables scientists to solve complex problems in biology, ecosystems, climate, energy, as well as physical and chemical interactions. Although DL has made great strides, it is still only beginning to emerge in many fields of marine science, especially towards representative applications and best practices for the automatic analysis of marine organisms and marine environments. DL in nowadays marine science mainly leverages cutting-edge techniques of deep neural networks and massive data which collected by in situ optical or acoustic imaging sensors for underwater applications such as plankton classification and coral reef detection. This research topic aims to expand the applications of marine science to cover all aspects of detection, classification, segmentation, localization, and density estimation of marine objects, organisms, and phenomena.

Manual on Estimation of Selectivity for Gillnet and Longline Gears in Abundance Surveys Holger Hovgård, Food and Agriculture Organization, Hans Lassen, 2008-04-29. This manual defines methods for estimating selectivity of gillnet and longline gears with particular reference to the use of these gears in abundance surveys. The manual illustrates how gear design, the basic concepts of size selection, and fish morphometric data can be used to model selectivity. Statistical estimation methods are described in detail and examples given of their application.

in spreadsheets The efficient use of these gears in abundance and research surveys is also discussed Although the manual concentrates on gillnets and longlines the methods given are general enough to be relevant to any research involving gear selectivity EPA Publications Bibliography Quarterly Abstract Bulletin United States.
