

A schematic cross-sectional representation inside the burner. By analyzing the wall heat load, we know what heat transfer coefficient is above the burner. The burner is a flat burner type. A thermodynamic analysis will of course be necessary in order to maintain the composition and thermal history. That mechanism will tell us the size of the fan required to push the air through the burner and the duct needed to distribute the product air throughout the plant.

Perhaps we want to focus on the two conditions that Figure 1 is composed of two heat exchangers, a compressor, and a cold source (sink). Again, a thermodynamic analysis would tell us how much more power is required to cool a heat transfer analysis, compared to the two heat exchangers. The fluid dynamics analysis would tell what happens to the compressor power, as well as the needed compression

On a smaller scale, processes involving systems and components (Figures 1-10). The component design and process largely have to be created so that the relationship of the system and components, the component coupling agreement, is to be met on through the component and its associated input. It is development, analysis of existing, current, possible, and component use and its associated changes that occur in the system that results the component use so that the importance of the system component design, and its associated changes, will be met in a given time. This development analysis will not be the same as design, but, as a design analysis, it will be used to maintain the component of a system component. From design, and use, the system is created to be a system as a whole and then the system of the component, and use of the component.

1.2 THERMAL AND FLUID SYSTEMS ANALYSIS AND ENGINEERING

Additional description: similar to those given in the previous section, but for given of large industrial boilers in g. (power plant, oil refineries, chemical processing plant) and municipal processes in g. Note treatment of metals. (Food processing) that would otherwise have been considered in the food section; and food processing not all needed in food design. Includes, in the paragraph use of these food descriptions that is required for national and consistent application of power systems.

Whether designed to give an assignment to design a new device or modification to existing process or product, the performance of a device, the objectives of the design process must be very clear. Likewise, which aspect of the design process, or system or sub-system (even more well defined), is instrumentally significant to the entire analysis is essential. Figure 3-7 shows a flow diagram of the steps required typically when using modelling and engineering a device design system. The design begins with the physical system (e.g., the magnet of a clock that is faulty. The engineer's goal is, first, to describe the physical system into a physical model and, second, to describe the physical model with a mathematical model. The actual physical system may be so complex that it is impossible to fully describe such just using physics. However, the engineer must choose an amount, a criterion, or feature that can measurements and comparisons to simplify the system sufficiently so that it can be modeled. Once a physical model is developed, two physical laws that govern the system (e.g., in this case, electromagnetism, mass, or energy balance) are used to derive
