

Goal: To write a short (1000 words or more, double spaced, standard font) philosophy paper on a topic of your choice in consultation with the instructor. You will be graded on clarity of thought and the ability to illustrate an understanding of the topics and themes of one (or some) of the major authors we've covered in class. One element of this understanding will be the appropriate use of textual support. That is, the use of quotations from the primary texts, and the ability to assimilate that information in your own words, with your own examples. I do NOT want to see merely regurgitated lecture notes.

Some notes about philosophy papers: Students often find philosophy papers difficult to write since the expectations are different from those in other disciplines, even from those of other disciplines in the humanities. What follows is some general advice about how to go about writing short (1000 words or more) philosophy papers

How to conceive of and write your paper: Philosophy papers usually involve both exposition and evaluation. In the expository part of the paper, which in such a short paper should be brief, your task is to explain the view or argument under consideration. Make sure that your explanation is as explicit and accurate as possible. The evaluation part of the paper is your chance to do some philosophy of your own and the key component of the paper. It is not enough merely to state whether you agree or disagree with the philosopher's conclusion. You should engage with the reasoning. Some questions you might consider: does the argument succeed in getting to the desired conclusion? Which premises are the weakest points of the argument? What objections might be raised to these premises? Are there any ways that her argument could be bolstered to defend against such objections?

As you write, think about your intended audience. You should write your paper as if you imagine your audience as someone who is intelligent and interested in the subject but has not studied it. (Think of yourself, before taking this class, or perhaps a friend in college with some interest in the subject.)

Philosophical Thesis: In philosophy papers, your thesis will state a position or claim. Think of the thesis as a roadmap that guides your reader in advance of where the argument will go and how you will get there. Of course, this requires actually having an argument to begin with which is one of the main challenges for novice philosophy writers. One informal litmus test is that if the paper reads like a biography or merely a report, then it likely does not have an argument and thus not a thesis. Another suggestion is to try to avoid announcing what you will do and preview more directly how you will do it. We will be discussing several sample theses in the upcoming lessons, but as always if you have any questions as you get started on your paper, please let me know. The thesis is the most important part of your paper; it tells the reader what your stance is on a particular topic and offers reasons for that stance. Since the rest of your paper will be spent defending your thesis—offering support for the thesis and reasons why criticism of the thesis may not be valid—it's crucial that you develop a strong thesis.
